Beazley Safeguard Religious institutions

Over the past two decades in the US, most of the highest profile allegations and litigation around sexual abuse issues have involved religious institutions, a trend which has been replicated in various other countries. More recently, detailed disclosure by religious institutions of the identities of historic abusers or those accused of abuse has intensified scrutiny and calls for accountability.

While the Roman Catholic church remains the most prominent focus of such claims, other denominations and religions have been confronted with similar issues. As well as exposures arising from participation in religious observance, the pastoral, social and educational elements of religious practice and life have also given rise to incidents and claims. Both clergy and volunteers from their religious communities will be involved in activities ranging through counselling, camps or retreats, childcare and schooling.

While the vast majority of such activities will take place in a safe and supportive environment, those participating in them can, on rare occasions, exploit the vulnerabilities of those around them. It is therefore essential that relevant participants are appropriately vetted, monitored and trained on safeguarding issues and procedures.

Where allegations are made, a swift and surefooted response is essential – one that addresses the position of the person making the allegation and their family, as well as the broader constituencies of both the specific community and other members of that denomination or religion. Institutions may also need to deal with law enforcement, regulators, religious authorities and private attorneys.

Allegations will often be disseminated very rapidly by both traditional and social media and many institutions will have little or no experience in dealing with this.

Beazley Safeguard has been designed as a comprehensive insurance, risk management and crisis response program to help religious institutions address areas of potential risk, and – if needed – to provide support in dealing with crisis response, communication and management.
